

Let's talk

Designing effective Planned Giving Programs

The United States is in the midst of the largest wealth transfer in history. An estimated $41 trillion will transfer through settled estates for the 55-year period from 1998-2052, according to a study completed by Boston College.

Nonprofit organizations that are proactive and work with an experienced wealth management and trust firm to develop a comprehensive planned giving program can benefit significantly from this trend.

An effective planned giving program should:

- Clarify the organization's mission for potential and existing donors
- Master a variety of estate planning techniques (e.g., gift annuities, split interest trusts) to help donors connect their philanthropic needs and goals to the charity's mission

Defining and Protecting the Mission

A strong Planning Giving Program includes a mission statement that is clearly stated and easy to understand. This will ensure that the donor is making an emotional connection between their gift and its impact to the cause.

In today's more virtual environment, the mission can be spread using a variety of media and formats. Social networking technology, such as Twitter, Facebook and the nonprofit organization's website, can provide vital, up-to-date information about how the organization is achieving its mission. These venues can expand

Key takeaways:

- The United States is in the midst of the largest wealth transfer in history. Nonprofit organizations that develop a comprehensive planned giving program can benefit from this trend significantly.
- Today's virtual world offers nonprofit organizations with opportunities to grow by sharing their mission in a variety of media with donors who may not have been accessible in the past.
- Nonprofit organizations should understand and consider important investment trends like impact investing and socially responsible investing.
- Outsourcing some of the services and expertise needed to develop a comprehensive planned giving program may allow some nonprofit organizations to grow and be more successful faster and more easily.

the nonprofit's reach to donors beyond the local level to a more global base. Many nonprofits are also using Skype on an increasing basis to reach out to existing and potential donors who may be looking for easy ways to give charitably from their home.

Nonprofit organizations should also be regularly browsing Internet forums to learn if there is any negative feedback about the organization. If a problematic message is found, it needs to be addressed swiftly since information can be posted and forwarded around the world in seconds. Inaccurate information should be dispelled with facts, perhaps even quoting reliable third-party sources, such as Charity Navigator, GuideStar, or the IRS.

Riding the Wave of Impact Investing

Nonprofits should understand and exploit the trend toward "impact investing." Impact investing is when a donor gifts to and invests in organizations with the intent to make a positive cultural, social or economic impact in the community. Since impact investing is estimated to grow from $50 billion in assets to more than $500 billion in assets within the next decade, this is a trend that nonprofit firms that want to grow should embrace.

Another area that has been important for donors for some time now is the notion of Socially Responsible Investing (SRI). This means that a donation is invested in "green" or socially responsible areas of need. Conversely, investments in certain companies or industries that are contrary to or inconsistent with the charity's mission may be excluded from a nonprofit's portfolio.

Impact investing and socially responsible investing are important values that need to be linked to the mission statement if these areas are going to be a part of the nonprofit organization's investment program.

Achieving competency in advanced planned giving and tax techniques

Advanced planned giving programs need competent personnel or advisors to review, educate and communicate complex planning techniques and legal issues to the nonprofit organization's staff and donors. These personnel are typically attorneys, CPAs, Certified Financial Planners (CFPs) and other credentialed advisors.

Smaller nonprofit organizations often cannot staff these types of advisors so they typically look for this expertise outside of the organization. Even larger groups may want access to professionals or advisors who have a deeper understanding of these issues and may look to an experienced wealth management and trust firm for this type of expertise.

An outside firm or advisor can often help nonprofit organizations that are in the early stages of their development avoid common pitfalls. Many nonprofits at this stage focus their entire efforts on fundraising. An important step that they may overlook is putting a gift acceptance policy in place prior to receiving gifts. This policy provides guidance to staff and donors around the types of assets that can be accepted as gifts. For instance, the nonprofit organization may need to consider whether it is ready to accept donations such as a piece of real estate or a closely-held business interest in the early stages of its formation.

Outside firms or advisors can also bring expertise and advice in areas that offer the nonprofit new opportunities for growth. For example, there is currently an increased demand for charitable gift annuities among donors who are fixed income investors due to record low interest rates. Nonprofits that can offer gift annuities can benefit from this increased demand. An experienced wealth management and trust firm can help the nonprofit organization invest the assets, hedge longevity risks, prepare tax reporting forms, assist in developing marketing materials, advise and consult on developing gifting procedures, and maintain a comprehensive reporting system.
